

About the Editors and Contributors

Naomi Aoki

Naomi received her M.A. in 2003 from the Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS) at Johns Hopkins University and is originally from Japan. During 2003-06, she served as a consultant at the World Bank in areas including fiscal decentralization and public expenditure management. She is currently a second-year Ph.D. student in Public Administration at the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs at Syracuse University. Naomi's main fields of interest include (de)centralization of public services delivery and organizational theories.

Farah Dib

Farah Dib has recently graduated from the Master of Public Administration program at the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs. She holds a Bachelor of Art in Economics from the American University of Beirut where she worked as an economic research assistant, analyzing gender differences in labor markets in the Middle East and North Africa. She wrote her paper, which appears in this volume, as part of a course on Local Public Finance in Transitioning and Developing Economies at the Maxwell School.

Rachel Fleishman

Rachel K. Fleishman is currently a PhD candidate in Public Administration at the Maxwell School, with a strong interest in environmental policy. Previous degrees include a B.A. in Chemistry from Vassar College and an M.S. in Natural Resources from the Ohio State University. Her dissertation focuses on watershed management in the U.S., although in the future she hopes to expand her research to include water-related problems faced by developing countries.

Tamara Hafner

Tamara worked in pharmaceutical research and development prior to joining the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs at Syracuse University where she is currently a Ph.D. candidate in Public Administration. She has general interests in global health, technological change and international development. Her current research focuses on pharmaceutical innovations in developing countries and the incentives needed to stimulate R&D on neglected diseases.

Heather Klein

Heather received a BSFS in International Economics and a Certificate in Latin American Studies from Georgetown University in 2002. She recently received a Master in Public Administration from the Maxwell School and is currently working as a Research Associate in the Global Studies Department of Samsung Economic Research Institute.

Jesse Lecy

Jesse Lecy worked in the field of humanitarian relief prior to earning a master's degree in Public Policy at Carnegie Mellon. He is continuing his education as a Ph.D. student in the Social Science program at the Maxwell School. His research focuses on understanding how structural components of civil society create incentive systems that influence NGO behavior. He also works on empirical issues of poverty measurement and modeling the impact of development interventions on communities.

Jacquelyn Micieli

A native of New York, Jackie has spent the past several years living in Western and Central New York while receiving her B.A. in Applied Music from SUNY Fredonia and her Master's in American Studies from the University at Buffalo. Currently at Syracuse University, Jackie is pursuing a second Master's degree in Museum Studies and her Doctorate in the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs. Her research interests include: queer diasporas, transnational feminisms, visual studies, geography and popular/public cultures.

Mark Z. Migliacci

Mark Z. Migliacci received his BA in Environmental Policy and Analysis from Boston University (2000) and a certificate in French Language and Civilization from La Sorbonne in Paris, France (2005). He has worked as an advocate for immigrants and refugees in Boston and taught courses in art and media in Singapore. During his time in Southeast Asia, he traveled widely and his encounters with the many peoples and cultures of the region sparked an interest in inter-governmental programs and international development. He has recently completed a Master of Public Administration at the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs with a focus on international development and finance.

Lawren Sinnema

Lawren Sinnema is currently pursuing his MA in International Relations at the Maxwell School of Syracuse University. During the summer of 2007, he worked with disadvantaged entrepreneurs in Cape Town, South Africa, while participating in a program at Stellenbosch University. His research interests include economic development and HIV/AIDS in Sub-Saharan Africa.

Diego Tisera

Diego completed his undergraduate degrees in economics and policy studies at Syracuse University and is currently a joint M.P.A and M.A in economics. His main interests are international development and trade economics. Prior to attending Maxwell, Diego was an international cost analyst for a security-contracting firm.

Nicole Wilson

Nicole Wilson is a doctoral student in the Department of Anthropology at Syracuse University. She completed her Bachelor's degree at The University of Colorado at Boulder and is the author of "The Modernization of Hijras" published in the 2006 edition of the Maxwell Review. She is currently researching Tamil Hindu Women's Religiosity in urban South India.