Andrew Lipman is defending his Ph.D. dissertation in June 2010 at the University of Pennsylvania. His project “The Saltwater Frontier: Indians, Dutch, and English on Seventeenth-Century Long Island Sound” examines the contentious borderland between New Netherland and New England as a maritime space. The term “saltwater frontier” is meant to evoke the fluid, shifting, and stormy quality of colonial and native relations, and to suggest that this was both a zone of porous boundaries and an integral part of the Atlantic World. He is the author of two articles, one appearing in The William and Mary Quarterly in January 2008 and the other forthcoming in Early American Studies in May 2011. Previously, he taught courses in American history at Rider University and at Penn.
